The New London Emergency Management Committee is seeking ways to enhance the resilience of our town for the likely presence of Coronavirus in our community. The Committee is made up of representatives of first responder agencies, health care institutions, the local senior center, visiting nurses, school authorities, sheltering staff and emergency health network organizations. The Greater Sullivan County Emergency Health Network, our nexus to the state's Public Health System, is also a member. The Committee provides for an optimum place to discuss items that may pose a threat to our community, in this case, a health crisis caused by a pandemic.

No one wants to believe that bad things will happen to them and if something happens, it will occur to others or the possible danger will be minimized. This normalcy bias is a natural psychological defense but, in this case, it may act as a shield to seeking and knowing the necessary and accurate information.

While your local health community and emergency first responders are coordinating every possible avenue with state and federal agencies, it behooves for each of us to become as well informed as we can about this new health challenge and adopt the mitigation techniques that will likely avoid contracting the disease.
